Al Voigt has always been uniquely interested in math and numbers. He remembers participating in math bowl/quiz competitions and his high school accounting classes. These experiences led him to majoring in accounting in college. He was initially concerned it might be a one dimensional career track but he found that his foundational compassion and sensitivity would help foster relationships with those he worked with who sought financial advice and assistance.

Whether it is serving as a financial translator to those who do not fully understand their own personal finances, advocating on behalf of a client with the IRS or working with business owners on complex forecasting and operations tasks, Al's strength lies in his ability to relate to clients and the support they need, in whatever capacity that may be.
